LAFITTE SOLVES A CRIME

RUBE HATCH, trapper, set a match to the shack and stood back, chuckling, as the flames leaped up. He was doing the last thing necessary to erase all marks of his crime. Old Benton lay inside with a bullet in his head—Rube's bullet. But nobody'd ever find the charred body of Benton. Or, if they did, it would make no difference.

When the shack was a mass of flames, Rube got his pack on his shoulder, picked up his rifle and strode off through the cypress trees toward his dugout floating in the bayou nearby. He got in, picked up the paddle, and shoved off. He whistled a careless tune as he drifted toward the delta. He was without worry of any sort.

Old Benton was gone. He'd never trouble Rube again.

The feud had lasted for several years. Both Benton and Rube Hatch were muskrat trappers. Good ones. Rube had the best run of the two, and several times Rube had caught Old Benton setting his traps on his—Rube's—run. Each had taken potshots at the other. But nothing really serious had developed.

Not until about a week earlier. Rube had again come across Old Benton, lifting a prime catch from a trap set on his run. He had gone berserk. They had exchanged blows there on the bank of a bayou and some bitter things had been said by each.

It was then that Rube decided to put an end to Old Benton. There was more behind this determination than just Benton's poaching forays. Benton was known to have a nice nest egg hidden away somewhere. Rube wanted that money.

He had gone to Benton's shack and fired as soon as the older man opened the door. Rube had ransacked the shack thoroughly. He had dug up the earthen floor, pulled the wall apart. And found nothing.

He cursed himself for an idiot for not making the old man tell him where the cache was hidden. But it was too late now. Benton was dead. Rube would have to search for the money.

For two or three days Rube cruised the bayous taking catches from his traps, resetting them, and pondering where Old Benton could have stashed his pile.

It was inevitable that someone should find the burned shack of Benton. They found his body, too. But it was so badly burned that identification was next to impossible. It was apparent, however, that a bullet had penetrated the old trapper's head.

The sheriff didn't have to guess long as to the murderer. "It was that good for nothing Rube Hatch," he said to a couple of deputies. "They've been a-feudin' years now. Rube done it."

"How ya gonna prove it, Sheriff?" drawled one of the men. "Ain't a clue around here."

The sheriff scratched his head in perplexity. "Ah dunno 'bout that," he replied. "But we know durn well he done it."

"No use bringin' him in 'thout havin' a clue," soliloquized one of the deputies. "Much as I'd like to hang it onto him. Can't just accuse a man of murder an' not be able to prove it."

So there it stood. Rube was guilty but he wasn't guilty. How to get something on him?

Eric Vale had been in the South a couple of weeks taking a much-needed vacation. Naturally, he heard about the shooting on the bayou. He had met the sheriff, who seemed like a good scout, but a little dumb.

Eric dropped in to see the sheriff one day.

"Heard about the killing," he said. "Know who did it?"

The sheriff spat into the big grass cuspidor and hitched his chair closer to his desk. "Sure, we know who done it, only we can't pin it onto him." He then related the story up to date.

"He'll be searching for that buried money, I suppose," Eric said casually. "Why not watch him?"

The sheiff snorted. "Watch a feller all over these here bayous? They's big, younster. Jist how we gonna do that?"

Eric shrugged. "You got me there. But you might watch Old Benton's shack—or the spot where it used to be."

"Doin' that, bub."

A week went by, during which the sheriff and his men kept a sharp lookout for a slip on Rube's part. But they found nothing. Rube was smart, knew he was being watched. He ran his lines and kept close to his cabin, and that was that.

Eric decided that Rube was going to be a tough hombre to trap. At least if his capture hinged upon the old-fashioned sheriff's methods. There must be another way to make the man come into the open and show his hand.

Pondering these things, Eric hit upon a plan. These people were superstitious. Play on their imaginations and you held the whip hand. The very country was steeped in superstition. Lafitte the old pirate stalked his bloody way through the region; tales of buried loot galore cluttered the local atmosphere. Eic would play that up. . . .

For a week Eric was gone. In New Orleans he busied himself with a clever scheme to bring a criminal out into the open. The question remained: Would it work? Only the sheriff was in on it, and the whole trick was a bit over the worthy sheriff's head. But he promised full cooperation.

When Eric arrived back in the village, things were pretty much as they had been when he left. Rube Hatch was still going his way.

"Well," said Eric, "here's where we smoke a skunk out!"

It would take darkness to work Eric's stunt. And so, on the first good dark night, he and the sheriff were on their way to Rube's shack. It was pitch black when they sneaked up. They could see the remains of a small fire smoldering in front. That would be where Rube had cooked his evening meal. Now the trapper slept.

Eric set up his contrivance. It was rather unwieldy and took some time. At last it was ready for the experiment. Eric was at the controls. A light flared out in the darkness, then a somber voice rumbled through the woods. A ghostly figure stalked across the cleared space before Rube's shack. It pointed an arm toward the shack, and its voice rolled forth.

Nothing happened. Rube slept on. The light faded.

"Maybe he's not in there," said Eric.

They crept to the open door of the shack and peered inside. Eric snapped on his flash. The bunk was there, but nobody lay in it. Their work had been in vain.

"Now what do ye know," said the sheriff. "I wonder where the scallawag is. Not like him a-tall."

"Could he have gone to the city with his furs?" Eric asked.

"P'raps," replied the sheriff. "Ain't hardly the time, though—'nless he's got a heap o' them."

"Wouldn't he be running Old Benton's lines now?" Eric wanted to know. "Seems logical."

The sheriff nodded. "Natchally, bub. Shore, thass it! He's got him a pack o' fur an' gone to N'Orleans. We'll have to wait till he gets back."

The next day the sheriff sent a good man to watch the region of Rube's shack, and report to them the arrival of its owner. Two days later the man sent them a message.

That night, Eric and the sheriff were again in their old spot. The apparatus had been set up. It was an hour past midnight. Rube snored in his bunk.

The light flashed on. The shadowy figure began its walk across the clearing. Its solemn voice called Rube's name.

"Rube . . . Rube . . . Come out, my man. . . ."

A stir inside the shack. Then Rube poked his rumpled head out the door. A cry was stifled in his throat. The figure had halted and now pointed at him.

"Come, Rube, be not afraid. It is I, Lafitte! You are a brave man and I would reward thee. You want riches—gold—jewels. I have them all, my own vast treasure. It is buried nearby. Ours for the digging, Rube!"

Rube rubbed his eyes. "A g-ghost!" he quavered. "Go 'way, Lafitte!" He made as if to reach for his gun.

The voice commanded. "You cannot shoot me, my friend," said Lafitte. "I am dead. You killed a man I did not like, so I'm going to reward you. Old Benton searched for years for my treasure. But he was not worthy, and that's why I would not show him where it was. But you—you, Rube, are one of my own men. You want my great treasure?"

"Y-yes—yes, Lafitte. Where is it buried?" Rube came into the open.

Lafitte nodded, then pointed to a spot before Rube's shack. "There, in front of you, my friend! You have only to dig. Now aren't you glad you killed our enemy, Benton?"

"Yes, I'm glad I killed him!" muttered Rube. He ran around the shack and appeared with a shovel. He began digging furiously.

Suddenly Lafitte began laughing. Rube looked up, seemingly having forgotten the pirate, so intent was he on his digging.

Lafitte continued to laugh as he began vanishing. He faded out with the words: "Good bye, murderer! Happy digging!"

The sheriff and Eric stole up behind Rube and stuck a gun in his ribs.

"All right, Rube," said the sheriff. "We heard it. You confessed to Old Benton's murder. . . . Come on!"

Rube was so dumbfounded he could not talk. The sheriff snapped handcuffs on his wrists.

"Yeah, that Eric Vale is a clever one, all right," the sheriff was telling his deputies next day. "He made that there movie of Lafitte—him bein' Lafitte himself—and coaxed a confession outa Rube. An' he talked jist like old Lafitte prob'ly did. It was spooky, 'I'm tellin' ye!"
